CHARCOAL, n. Cha³r'kol. Lat., carbo. Fr., charbon. Ger., Kohle. It., carbone. Sp., carbón. Port., carvão. A substance derived from the imperfect combustion of certain animal and vegetable carbonaceous materials, particularly bones (animal c.) and wood (wood c.). It is a black porous substance devoid of taste and odor and insoluble in water and in alcohol. It burns without smoke or flame. It consists of pure carbon mixed with a variable proportion of inorganic ash, which, in the case of c. prepared from bones, consists chiefly of the phosphate and carbonate of calcium. Bone c. also contains nitrogenous matters, is less porous and less combustible than wood c., and is of a duller hue. Both varieties of c., but particularly animal c., have the power of attracting many substances, especially coloring and flavoring principles, from their solutions. C. is therefore much used for clarifying and decolorizing liquids in laboratories and manufactories. Both varieties of c. also have a marked power of absorbing gases, this power being especially pronounced in the more porous wood c., which can take up more than a hundred times its volume of gaseous ammonia. The noxious principles evolved in the putrefaction of organic substances are also absorbed by c. and rendered inert. [B.]—Albuminated c. Fr., charbon albuminé. A preparation used for clarifying and decolorizing syrupy and other liquids. It is made of purified animal c. and a sufficient quantity of the white of egg to form a paste, which is dried in the sun or in an oven, and, when dry, is pulverized, again mixed with the white of egg, made into a paste, and dried. This operation may be repeated. [B, 92 (a, 21); "Proc. of the Am. Pharm. Assoc.," xxvii, p. 317 (B).]—Animal c. Lat., carbo animalis [U. S. Ph., Br. Ph., Belg. Ph., Gr. [E.]—Morgan's c. An operation in which, after the entire lip is first removed by a semilunar incision, a curvilinear incision is made parallel to and about half an inch below the first; and finally the skin between the two incisions is detached (except at its extremities) and lifted into the place previously occupied by the diseased tissue. [E.]—Mütter's c. An operation in which, the diseased tissues being first removed by a semi-elliptical incision, two slightly curved incisions are carried from the centre of the first incision downward and outward to the base of the inferior maxillary bone. From the ends of these incisions two others are carried upward and outward along the base of the lower jaw till they reach points opposite the terminal points of the original semi-elliptical incision. Two quadrangular flaps are thus made, which are raised into place and joined to each other in the median line, and also to the triangular piece of integument below. [E.]—Roux's c. An operation in which, after the removal of the affected tissues and the formation of suitable flaps, the prominent centres of the superior maxillary bones are removed to make room for a proper and easy adjustment of the integuments. [E.]—Serres's c. An operation applicable in cases where the disease is confined to the integument and subjacent muscles. Only the affected tissues are cut away, and the healthy mucous membrane is turned down over the margin of what is subsequently to form the lip. [E.]

An instrument devised by Landolt for determining the distance between the two eyes during the act of convergence. It consists of a long rectangular box lined with black, unreflecting material, and provided with a cover. At one end are two short tubes for the reception of the eyes, the margins of which are applied to the inner margins of the orbits. There is an incision or gap for the nose, while the upper edge of the box supports the forehead. On the inside of the box the holes corresponding to the tubes may be rapidly closed and opened by spring diaphragms, the triggers of which appear above the cover of the box. The other end of the box is closed by two metallic plates which slide over each other, in each of which there is a vertical slit, ¼ mm. wide. In the middle of the box there is a metallic septum or diaphragm with a similar vertical slit. The patient being placed in position, with the eyes in contact with the short tubes destined for them in one end of the box, the box is closed, and the opposite end turned toward a brightly illuminated window. The small disk which covers the left eye-tube or ocular is then opened, and the corresponding metallic plate at the other end of the box is made to slide in and out until the eye sees the slit in the central diaphragm illuminated. The axis of vision of the eye then corresponds with the direction of the ray of light passing through the slit in the central diaphragm and through the slit in the metallic plate at the end of the box. The latter plate is then left in position, the disk covering the left ocular is closed, and the same procedure is carried on with the other eye, only with the opposite end-plate. As the distance of the centers of rotation of the eyes from the central diaphragm is the same as the distance of the latter from the plates or diaphragms at the end of the box, the distance between the two nodal points is equal to the distance between the two vertical slits in the diaphragm. This may be read off on a scale placed on the diaphragm at the end of the box. In this way the position of the two eyes is determined, as well as their distance from each other. [Graefe and Saemisch (F).]

CHLORINE, n. Klor'en. From χλωρός, green. Lat., chlorum. chlorinum. Fr., chlore. Ger., Chlor. It., Sp., cloro. A nonmetallic element discovered by Scheele in 1774. It is a greenish-yellow transparent gas having an intensely irritant, disagreeable, suffocating odor. It dissolves in about half its volume of cold water, forming a greenish solution having the odor of the gas. At − 34° C. the gas condenses into a yellowish liquid. The sp. gr. of the gas, compared with that of air, is 2·45. C. combines very readily with hydrogen, forming hydrochloric acid, and, owing to this affinity for hydrogen, it acts in the presence of moisture as a powerful bleaching and disinfecting agent by combining with the hydrogen of water and liberating oxygen, which in the nascent state attacks organic coloring matters with energy and destroys living organisms. C. also combines directly with the metallic and also with all the non-metallic elements, forming the class of compounds called chlorides, which are widely diffused throughout the mineral, vegetable, and animal kingdoms. In combination, it acts almost without exception as a univalent element, replacing only 1 atom of hydrogen. In some rare cases, however, it appears to be trivalent. Atomic weight, 35·37 ; symbol, Cl (or, in the writings of continental authors, occasionally Ch). [B, 3, 6.]—C. acetate. Fr., acétate de chlore. Ger., essigsaures Chlor. It., acetato di cloro. Sp., acetato de cloro. Syn. : acetohypochlorous anhydride. A colorless liquid, $Cl.O.C_2H_3O$, which explodes when heated to 100° C. Ger., C., reines C. It., chloroformio. Sp., cloroformio, cloroformo, clórido fórmico [Sp. Ph.]. Syn.: dichlorinated chloride of methyl, trichloromethane, trichloride of methyl. A body having the composition $CHCl_3$, discovered by Guthrie in 1831, and about the same time independently by Soubeiran and Liebig. A clear, colorless liquid of peculiar pleasant odor and sweetish burning taste, very soluble in alcohol and in ether, only moderately soluble in water, boiling at 60° to 61° C., and not inflammable. Its sp. gr. at 15° C. varies between 1·485 and 1·500, according to the amount of alcohol it may contain. It dissolves iodine, bromine, fixed and volatile oils, most of the resins and fats, camphor, caoutchouc, mastic, copal, and benzoin. It has marked antizymotic powers, inhibiting the action of the organized ferments. Given by the mouth, it is a stomachic stimulant and carminative (in large doses, a narcotic), and has been thought to exert a solvent action on gallstones. Applied externally, being prevented from evaporating, it is irritant and slightly anodyne. For the action of its inhaled vapor in suspending consciousness, see Surgical ANÆSTHESIA. Fr., c., chlorome. Ger., Chlorom. Syn.: chloro-sarcoma, green cancer, periosteal (or metastatic) sarcoma. A rare disease, first described by Balfour in 1834, since which time a number of cases have been recorded, all occurring in children. A case observed by F. G. Gade, of Christiania, was that of a little girl aged 5, who first suffered from anæmic symptoms, and then from a tumor of the left cheek, with toothache, tinnitus aurium, otorrhœa, deafness, and continually increasing exophthalmia. Nine weeks after these symptoms appeared, she died with pyrexia and great prostration, without having exhibited any phenomena of cerebral mischief. At the post-mortem examination an immense number of greenish-yellow and greenish-gray fibrous tumors of sarcomatous structure were found in various situations, but more especially connected with the periosteum. They were found on the dura mater, in the internal ear, in the orbit, in the periosteum of the skull and facial bones, in large numbers on the sternum, on the ribs, and in many other localities. The green coloring matter, which can be dissolved out by maceration in chloroform as a dark-green oily liquid, is not related, according to Gade and Otto, either to the blood or to the biliary coloring matter, but is formed from fat granules, great numbers of which are found in the cells of the neoplasm. Ger., epidemische (oder orientalische) C. It., colera asiatico. Sp., cólera morbo asiático. An acute infectious disease indigenous to India, whence it is at times conveyed to other parts of the world in the form of destructive epidemics that follow the paths of human travel; attributed to a specific micro-organism, the Spirillum choleræ asiaticæ or comma bacillus. The disease is characterized by vomiting and purging, the discharges resembling rice-water; by painful cramps; and by the early occurrence of collapse with suppression of urine and a peculiar coldness of the breath. The characteristic rice-water discharges are generally preceded by ordinary diarrhœa. In cases of apparent recovery there is still the danger of the secondary fever that sometimes supervenes. The chief pathological feature seems to consist in the deficiency of liquor sanguinis due to the excessive watery discharges. Outbreaks of the disease may be prevented with great certainty by proper sanitary measures, but its curative treatment, which has been attempted in the most diverse ways, is of little avail and is for the most part confined to combating symptoms as they arise. It is said to be identical with the hydrocarotin obtained from the carrot [Arnaud (B)], and is also found in various vegetable oils, e. g., olive-oil [Beneke (B)], sweet-almond oil [Lindenmayer (B)], chaulmoogra oil, oil of bondue, oil of jequirity-seeds, and the fatty and waxy matters obtained from the leaves of Erythroxylon hypericifolium. [E. According to some accounts, the names of these saints were given to c. because their intercession was believed to be specially efficacious in bringing about a cure. Fr., chromatoptométrie. Ger., Chromatoptometrie. Examination of the eye with reference to the degree of its sensibility to rays of light of various wave-lengths. The simplest method is that devised by Daae. The instrument consists of a card-board containing ten horizontal rows of colors, each series being composed of seven colors, represented by woolen threads. In a certain number of series the colors are placed in the order of intensity. These rows correspond to the numbers 3 (purple), 7 (green), and 9 (red). The card-board is placed before the patient in bright daylight, and he is caused to note that certain horizontal lines contain colors of the same tone, but of different shades. He is then asked if the colors of the first row are of the same kind, and the same question is asked him of all the rows on the card-board. If he recognizes all the colors with their gradations, his color-perception is normal. If he distinguishes neither the lines which contain but one color nor the others, his color-perception is not completely determined, and the examination must be gone over again. If the patient indicates one of the series as containing but one color, when in reality it contains different colors, he is color-blind, and it then remains to determine, in any of the usual ways, the variety of color-blindness. [F.]

CINCHONA (Lat.), n. f. Si^{2}n^2(ki^{2}n^2)-ko(ch^{2}o)′na^3. From the Countess of Cinchon (in Peru), to whom the remedy was administered in 1638. Fr., quinquina. Ger., China. It., china. Sp., quina. 1. A genus of rubiaceous trees of the suborder Cinchoneæ, division Eucinchoneæ, distinguished by the cylindrical corolla terminating in 5 small horizontally expanded lobes, varying in color from white to bright-red and purple, and fringed at the margin; by the inflorescence disposed in terminal panicles or cymes; and by the dehiscence of the valves of the capsules from the base, the two halves of the capsule remaining attached to their apex by the permanent calyx. Owing to the number of hybrids formed between the different species and the difficulty of distinguishing the latter from each other, the genus has been most variously subdivided. Weddell divides it into 5 stirpes or stems: 1. Stirps Cinchonæ officinalis; 2. Stirps Cinchonæ rugosæ; 3. Stirps Cinchonæ micranthæ; 4. Stirps Cinchonæ calisayæ; 5. Stirps Cinchonæ ovatæ (q. v. infra), embracing 31 species and various subspecies and hybrid forms. Kuntze, who has most recently investigated the subject, recognizes only 4 distinct primary species, all the others being regarded as varieties or hybrids of these 4. These primary species are the C. weddelliana (C. calisaya) and the C. pahudiana (C. carabayensis), including all varieties with coarse, moderately sized leaves, longitudinally contracted, ribbed capsule, the two parts of which are held together by the expanded calyx; and the C. howardiana (C. succirubra) and C. pavoniana (C. micrantha), including varieties with thinner and larger leaves and dilated capsule without ribs, terminating in a small unexpanded calyx. See these species infra. 2. In the U. S. Ph., the bark of any variety of C. containing at least 3 per cent. of alkaloids. See C.-bark, Red c.-bark, Pale c.-bark, and Yellow c.-bark. Sp., quina de Loja [Sp. Ph.]. A name applied to the brownish or grayish barks derived from the younger branches and twigs of various species of C.; distinguished by their relatively smaller size (from ⅛ to ½ inch in diameter), their quilled shape, their grayish-brown external surface frequently covered with shallow transverse and longitudinal markings, the brownish color of the middle and inner layers which are separated from the external layer by a resin zone, and by their relatively smooth fracture. They are especially rich in cinchonine and have an astringent rather than bitter taste. They are derived from C. mi- crantha and its varieties, C. macrocalyx, C. nitida, C. officinalis, and similar species, which are found especially in South America, being rarely cultivated in the East or West Indies. The chief varieties of pale c. are c. Huánuco, c. Loxa (the most important variety), c. Jaén, and c. Huamalies (q. v.). Fr., quinquina rouge [Fr. Cod.]. Ger., rothe China (oder Chinarinde). It., china rossa. Sp., quina roja. A variety of c.-bark distinguished by the reddish-brown color of the middle and inner bark-layers. It occurs either in large flat pieces (derived from the trunk or larger branches), as in most specimens from South America, or in quills (from the smaller branches), as in the cultivated varieties of the East Indies. It contains more quinine than the pale bark, but less than the yellow bark, and is of a decidedly bitter taste. It is more fibrous in structure than the pale bark, and has a fine, splintery fracture. It is derived almost exclusively from the C. succirubra, although two varieties (of little commercial importance) are furnished by the C. coccinea and the C. lucumæfolia. The variety (china rubiginosa) furnished by the last-named species, which is more fibrous and orange-colored than the ordinary red c. and which contains little besides cinchonine, is expressly forbidden for use by the U. S. Ph. and the Russ. Ph.; and these pharmacopœias, as well as the Ger. Ph. (1st ed.) and the Dan. Ph., forbid the South American (quilled) barks. For pharmaceutical purposes the red bark should contain 1·5 per cent. [Br. Ph.] or 2 per cent. [U. S. Ph., Fr. Cod., Russ. Ph.] of quinine and 1 per cent. of cinchonine [Russ. Ph.], or 2·5 per cent. [Aust. Ph., Roum. Ph.], 3 per cent. [Fr. Cod.], or 3·5 per cent. [Ger. Ph.] of total alkaloids. A bark allied to the red bark is furnished by the Remijia (q. v.), and a spurious red c.-bark is furnished by the Cascarilla magnifolia. The blood enters the body through the umbilical vein, by which and its branches and connections the larger portion passes through the liver, a relatively small quantity entering the inferior vena cava through the ductus venosus. The portion which passes through the liver enters the ascending vena cava, which then contains the blood from the lower portion of the body, that which comes directly from the umbilical vein, and that from the hepatic veins. It then enters the right auricle of the heart, where it is deflected by the Eustachian valve through the foramen ovale into the left auricle. The blood from the head and upper portion of the body enters the right auricle and passes through the auriculo-ventricular opening into the right ventricle. That in the left auricle passes into the left ventricle, and thence into the aorta, while that in the right ventricle passes through the ductus arteriosus also into the aorta. The blood in the aorta, with the exception of that which goes to the head and upper portion of the body, passes down into the internal iliac arteries, and thence, with the exception of that supplying the lower portion of the body, passes through the hypogastric arteries to the umbilicus, where they form the umbilical arteries. Through the umbilical arteries it passes to the placenta, and thence to the umbilical vein. [B.]—C. acid. Lat., acidum citricum [U. S. Ph., Br. Ph., Ger. Ph.], acidum citri. Fr., acide citrique [Fr. Cod.]. Ger., Citronensäure. It., acido citrico. Sp., ácido citrico. A tribasic crystalline acid, $C_6H_8O_7 = C(OH).CO.OH$ with $CH_2.CO.OH$ and $CH_2CO.OH$, first isolated by Scheele in 1784. It occurs under the form of transparent rhombic, prismatic crystals, of a pleasant acid taste, readily soluble in water and in alcohol, but much less soluble in ether. It is usually found associated with a molecule of water of crystallization. In the free state it occurs in the lemon, orange, cranberry, whortleberry, sloe, hip-berry, and bitter-sweet; associated with malic acid in the gooseberry, raspberry, strawberry, bilberry, currant, and cherry; and with both malic and tartaric acids in the tamarind and the berry of the mountain ash (Sorbus aucuparia). In the form of salts of potassium and calcium, it is found in many garden vegetables, potatoes, onions, beets, lettuce, etc., also in the tobacco plant, lily of the valley (Convallaria majalis), etc. It was first obtained from lemon-juice and is still usually so prepared. The fresh juice, on this account, is used in scurvy. It has been used in rheumatism, in malarial fevers, and as a hæmostatic. characteristic of the other species. The flowers are slightly purpled on one surface, and the fruit is very large. The species is usually divided into the following varieties, regarded by some botanists as distinct species: cedra; limonum (see C. limonum); lumia (see C. lumia); limetta (see C. limetta [2d def.]). 2. It was the only species of C. known to the ancients. The fruit (Lat., citreum, malum citreum) is large, sometimes weighing from 20 to 30 lbs. It is sometimes called Adam's apple, the Jews believing that this was the fruit eaten by Adam contrary to God's command, and is used by them in the ceremonies of the Feast of the Tabernacles, but is to be distinguished from the C. pomum Adami of Risso. The whole fruit is candied and known in the markets as poncires or poncines. The peel forms much of the commercial lemon-peel, and the candied peel appears in the market either as citronnat or as succat. The rind may furnish an oil (Fr., essence de cédrat), but that which appears as such in the shops is adulterated or altogether fictitious. The fruit is round or pear-shaped, and weighs up to 12 lbs. It has a thick, smooth peel, which contains a volatile oil, and a juicy, edible pulp of medicinal value, especially in diseases of acclimatization in the tropics. A species indigenous to northern East India, southern China, and Cochin-China, and cultivated in southern Europe, northern Africa, the West Indies, and elsewhere. The leaves (folia aurantii [Ger. Ph.]) are used in nervous affections; the unripe fruit, as large as a cherry, is employed for issue peas, and on distillation furnishes an oil (Fr., essence de petit grain) which is now furnished by the leaves also. An infusion of the leaves is known in Italy as acqua di bette. The flowers (flores aurantii) yield the essence de néroli bigarade and orange-flower water. The peel or rind of the fruit (aurantii amari cortex [U. S. Ph.], aurantii cortex [Br. Ph.]) yields an oil used to flavor tinctures and elixirs. The ripe fruit is too bitter to eat. Its peel (flavedo aurantiarum, cortex aurantiorum mundatus, seu expulpatus) is a tonic, carminative, and stomachic, and is used in the manufacture of essences, etc. The workmen who peel the fruit are subject to dizziness, tinnitus aurium, subsultus tendinum, disturbances of digestion, and sometimes epileptic fits. CLASSIFICATION, n. Kla^{3}s-i^2-fi^2-ka'shu^{3}n. Lat., classificatio (from classis, a class, and facere, to make). Fr., c. Ger., C., Abtheilung in Klassen. It., classificazione. Sp., clasificación. In general, the systematic arrangement of objects of nature or of art, in order to facilitate their study ; in botany, the methodical and scientific grouping of all plants, living or fossil, into species, genera, tribes, families, orders, classes, or other divisions, in accordance with some one or more characteristics of organization, function, habitat, form, or external or internal structure, common to each group, as exemplified in the systems of the following (and other) botanists—viz.: A. Of Cæsalpinus (1583), who distributed all the plants then known into fifteen classes, distinguished by the fruit. B. Of Linnæus, who arranged all known genera of plants under 24 classes, each based on some arbitrary character derived from the floral organs. This is the principal artificial c. The first 13 classes comprised all plants with perfect flowers and were named Monandria, Diandria, etc.—i. e., one-stamened, two-stamened, etc., to the 13th class, called Polyandria (having 20 or more stamens). The 14th and 15th classes were founded on the length of the stamens, Didynamia (2 long and 2 short stamens) and Tetradynamia (4 long and 2 short stamens). The next four classes are distinguished by the union of the stamen, Monadelphia, Diadelphia, Polyadelphia, and Syngenesia. The next class, Gynandria, depends on the cohesion of the stamens with the pistil. The next three classes, Monœcia, Diœcia, and Polygamia, include all plants with diclinous flowers. The last class, Cryptogamia, includes the flowerless plants. The orders of the first 13 classes are determined by the number of styles or stigmas on each flower, order 1 being Monogynia, order 2 Dygynia, and so on up to the 12th, called Polygynia, with more than 12 styles. The orders of class 14 depend on the seed-vessels, and are termed Gymnospermia and Angeiospermia. The orders of class 15 depend on the fruit, being Siliculosa and Siliquosa. The orders of classes 16, 17, and 18 are known by the number of stamens, and named, like the first classes, Triandria, Pentandria, etc. The orders of class 19 are 5—viz.: Æquales, Superflua, Frustanea, Necessaria, and Segregata. The orders of classes 20, 21, and 22 are distinguished in the same way as the first 13 classes and as the 16th, 17th, and 18th classes—as order 1, Monandria; order 2, Diandria, etc. The orders of class 23 are founded on the relative position of the flower, as Monœcia, Diœcia, and Triœcia. The orders of the 24th are: 1, Filices; 2, Musci; 3, Hepaticæ; 4, Lichenes; 5, Fungi; and 6, Algæ. C. Of De Candolle (1824), who divided the vegetable kingdom into cellular and vascular plants, subdividing the latter into exogens or dicotyledons, and endogens or monocotyledons. These are subdivided into 8 families: Thalamiflores, Caliciflores, Corolliflores, Monochlamydes, Phanerogames endogènes, Cryptogames endogènes, Cellulaires foliacées, and Cellulaires afoliacées. This c., with some modifications, is now the one generally adopted in England and the United States. D. Of Jussieu (1789), who, following Nature, divided all plants into acotyledons, monocotyledons, and dicotyledons, the first comprising the cryptogams, the second, according to the insertion of the stamens, being divided into epigynous, perigynous, or hypogynous classes, and the third, comprising a large number of plants, being subdivided into hermaphrodite dicotyledons (including the apetalous, monopetalous, and polypetalous plants) and the Diclinæ. These divisions were divided into 15 classes, according to the mode of insertion of the stamens or the character and relations of the corolla, as follows: a, Acotylédonie (Fungi); b, Monohypogynie (Gramineæ); c, Monopérigynie (Irideæ); d, Monoépigynie (Orchideæ); e, Épistaminie (Aristolochieæ); f, Péristaminie (Polygoneæ); g, Hypostamine (Plantagineæ); h, Hypocorollie (Solaneæ); i, Péricorollie (Ericaceæ); j, Synantherie (Cichoraceæ); k, Corisantherie (Rubiaceæ); l, Épipetalie (Umbelliferæ); m, Hypopétalie (Cruciferæ); n, Péripétalie (Rosaceæ); and o, Diclinie (Amentaceæ). E. Of Lindley, who makes two grand groups—flowering and flowerless plants, which he divides into seven classes: thallogens, acrogens, rhizogens, endogens, dictyogens, gymnogens, and exogens. Into the 303 families of his c. he admits 56 alliances (nixus), a kind of natural section interposed between the families and classes. F. Of Brongniart (1843 to 1850), who divided the vegetable kingdom into Cryptogams and Phanerogams, subdividing these into 68 classes and 296 families. G. Of Endlicher, who divides all plants into two regions and five sections, which he subdivides into cohorts, embracing 52 classes, in which there are 277 families embracing 6,895 genera. H. Of Sachs, who divides the whole vegetable kingdom into Thallophyta and Cormophyta. The first division has two sections, embracing Algæ, or plants without, and Fungi, plants with, chlorophyll. The Thallophyta are further subdivided into four classes: Protophyta, Zygosporeæ, Oosporeæ, and Carposporeæ. The Cormophyta embrace three series: the Bryophyta, including the classes Filicales, Equisetaceæ, and Dichotomeæ; and the 3d series, Phanerogamæ, including the two classes Gymnospermæ and Angeiospermæ, the last comprising the divisions Monocotyledones and Dicotyledones. I. Of Cauvet (1885), who divides plants into the three grand divisions of acotyledons (including cryptogams), monocotyledons, and dicotyledons, including in all more than 70 families, the c. being based upon the relations of the ovary and petals, their absence or presence, and their situation. [B, 34, 104; α, 24.]—Artificial c. Fr., c. artificielle. A c. founded on certain features of resemblance selected arbitrarily, without regard to features which, although less apparent, are more essential. [α, 24.]—C. parallélique (Fr.). A form of c. proposed by G. St.-Hilaire, founded on the theory that all living beings are modified offshoots from the same stock. COCAINE, n. Ko′ka^3-en. Lat., cocaina, cocainum. Fr., cocaïne. Ger., Cocain. It., Sp., cocaina. An alkaloid, $C_{17}H_{21}NO_4$, extracted from the leaves of Erythroxylon coca (the coca plant). It occurs under the form of colorless, odorless, monoclinic prisms which melt at about 98° F. and dissolve with difficulty in water, but are freely soluble in ether and somewhat soluble in alcohol. It is inflammable, burning with a bright flame, and leaving charcoal. Chemically it acts as a strong monacid base, uniting with acids to form salts. According to Lossen, it has the composition of benzoylmethylecgonine, $C_9(CH_3)(C_6H_5CO)H_{13}NO_3$. It is a nerve stimulant, and in toxic doses produces nausea, delirium, asphyxia, and fatal collapse. Its action falls chiefly on the cerebrum, though it also influences the spinal cord and nerve-trunks. When it causes death, it acts by paralyzing the respiratory centres. Though it has proved of some use in hysteria and other nervous disorders, its chief value is as a local anæsthetic when applied to mucous surfaces or injected into the part to be affected. In the latter case its action is very brief unless it is prevented from being swept away in the circulation by appliances (such as those devised by J. L. Corning) for confining it. With such special precautions, it has been used successfully in major operations. It is said to have been made to operate through the unbroken skin by means of cataphoresis. Its anæsthetic property was first made known by C. Koller. [W. O. Moore, "N. Y. Med. Jour.," Jan. 3, 1885, p. 19; B, 5 (a, 24).]—C. benzoate. Lat., cocainœ benzoas, cocainum benzoicum. Fr., benzoate de c. Ger., benzoësaures Cocain. It., benzoato di cocaina. Sp., benzoato de cocaina. A compound of c. and benzoic acid, formed by neutralizing a solution of c. with benzoic acid. Bignon, "Ann. di chim. e di farmacol.," Apr., 1886, p. 269 (B); "Nouv remèdes," Feb. 15, 1886; "N. Y. Med. 20 or more together. They are of triangular form and, with the outer husk, about a foot long, inclosing a hard shell which, with its contents, is known as the cocoa-nut. Its uses are numerous. The white albumen of the nut serves as food, and the milk as drink. The oil is used in cookery. Its stearin is used for making candles, while the clear oil is employed for illuminating purposes. The fibre is made into matting, brushes, brooms etc. The hard shell is made into cups and domestic utensils. Medicinally, the oil has been found useful in pulmonary diseases, its virtues being similar to those of cod-liver oil, while it has the advantage of being more palatable and not producing nausea. In Germany it is used in place of lard in pharmacy, as vegetable substances and ointments keep better prepared with this oil than with lard. It is also used in making soap, but, as it contains free caprylic acid, it is rather unfit for toilet soaps, leaving a rancid odor on the skin. CODEINE, n. Kod-e'en. Lat., codeina [U. S. Ph., Br. Ph., Swed. Ph.], codeinum [Ger. Ph., Russ. Ph., Greek Ph., Swiss Ph., Netherl. Ph.], codeia (from κώδεια, a poppy-head). Fr., codéine [Fr. Cod.]. Ger., Codein. It., Sp., codeina [Sp. Ph.]. 1. An alkaloid, $C_{18}H_{21}NO_3=C_{17}H_{18}(CH_3)NO_3$, prepared from opium. As the formula indicates, it is the methyl derivative of morphine. It forms whitish, rhombic crystals which have a bitterish taste, are without odor and slightly efflorescent in air. They melt at 150° C. Codeine is generally considered a feeble drug, free from many of the objections to opium, but not so strong. Reports are conflicting as to its effect upon the human economy, some severe cases of poisoning having been published. It is probable that the commercial drug is of varying composition. In France it is used as a calmative. In recent years it has been highly recommended in the treatment of diabetes mellitus and as a remedy for abdominal pain, the advantage alleged being that it can be pushed further than morphine without causing drowsiness or impairing the digestion. [T. L. Brunton, "Brit. Med. Jour.," June 9, 1888, p. 1213; "N. Y. Med. Jour.," Dec. 22, 1888, p. 700.] 2. The purest has the least fishy smell. The sp. gr. varies from 0·915 to 0·9195, that of the purest being 0·917. Alcohol dissolves from 2·5 to 6 per cent. of the oil. It is readily soluble in ether. On analysis, it is shown to contain gaduin, oleic, palmitic and stearic acids with glycerin. The amount of iodine is so small as not to be detected by the ordinary tests. Its therapeutic value as an alterative and nutritive in tuberculous and scrofulous diseases, and in all conditions attended with general emaciation and malassimilation, is not surpassed by that of any other article in the materia medica. Of Linnæus, a genus of rubiaceous plants, belonging, according to Bentham and Hooker, to the tribe Ixoreæ, comprising some twenty species cultivated in tropical Asia, Africa, and the Mascarene Islands. Fifty or sixty species were formerly enumerated, but the number has been greatly reduced by referring the American species to other genera. The original home of the coffee-tree is supposed to be Abyssinia, where in the district called Caffa (from which it is supposed to derive its name) it is still found wild. All the species of this genus are evergreen shrubs or small trees, with small white and fragrant flowers having globular or tubular corollæ, and stamens fixed at the top of the tube or on its inner face and protruding beyond it. The fruit is a small 2-celled berry containing 2 seeds convex on the outside and flat on the inside, where they are marked by a furrow. COFFEA ARABICA. [A, 327.]

d'Arabie. Ger., arabischer Kaffeebaum, ächter Kaffee. Syn.: C. vulgaris [Mönch]. The common coffee-plant, and the original source of most of the coffee in cultivation. It is a small, much-branched, pyramidal tree, resembling a cherry-tree, but with a whitish bark and more slender and horizontally spreading branches. The leaves are opposite and are of a dark-green color on the upper surface, and of elliptical, lance-like form, about six inches long. The flowers are fragrant and white, like orange-tree flowers, and form clusters in the axils of the leaves. The young fruit, at first of a green color, reddens when it ripens, and is oblong and about the size of a small cherry. Each berry contains two seeds closely united by their flat sides, which constitute the coffee-berries of commerce. The plant is indigenous to Abyssinia, and is found wild also in Liberia and Victoria Nyanza, cultivated in Arabia and in nearly all tropical countries. Ger., Koloquinteon, Coloquintenapfel. It., colloquintida. Sp., coloquintida. Malay, peycommutte. Beng., makal. Syn.: bitter apple, bitter cucumber. The Citrullus colocynthis, an annual plant of the order Cucurbitaceæ, a native of Turkey, but growing in various parts of Asia and Africa. It is cultivated in Spain. The stems are herbaceous, hairy, and trail on the ground or attach themselves to neighboring plants by their tendrils. The leaves are many-cleft, sinuated, obtuse, and hairy, green above and pale beneath. The flowers are yellow and axillary. The fruit is a globular pepo of the size of a small orange, yellow and smooth, and contains a white, spongy, medullary matter inclosing numerous ovate, compressed seeds. The seeds are bitter, but not active. The pulp alone (the colocynthidis pulpa of the Br. Ph., the colocynthis of the U. S. Ph.) is employed medicinally. Its bitter principle is colocynthin, of which it contains 14 per cent., besides extractive, oil, resin, gum, pictin, etc. C. is a powerful drastic purgative and hydragogue. It is also thought to be diuretic. It enters largely into the composition of various pills and extracts, and, when modified by other ingredients, forms a very efficient and mild purgative.
